Making a difference down in the dump

Dinner. Children from the commune come in for three meals a day.
I first set foot on the Steung Meanchey garbage dump nearly 10 years ago and that’s when life as I knew it began to unravel.

It was an apocalyptic sight. Around 1,500 children, from toddlers to teens, working and living upon 11 hectares of churning garbage. The heat, the haze and a smell that was almost tactile. I remember first seeing the children. They were beyond sad. I saw fear, hopelessness and children without light in their eyes. I was unable to walk away; I moved here and set up the Cambodian Children’s Fund, and the rest is now history.

Back then, the dream was to get these kids off the dumpsite, into a safe environment and - most of all - into a desperately-needed education. That seemed an insurmountable mission and it nearly was. I started the only way I knew how – one child at a time: one by one, every day and almost every night.

At present, we provide a quality education each day to over 1,517 children, ages 6 years through 20 years. Their families receive essential support, from medical treatment to subsidized food to emergency housing.

This is also a truly special moment in our short history: those tragic little figures who first entered CCF in 2004 are now strong, impassioned young adults, determined to make theirs a better generation. This year, 37 of our children sat for their Year 12 exams and 37 passed. This month, 37 started university, including six scholarships. That’s why the title here is “Living the Dream”.

The pillars of CCF are education and leadership. The community programmes that support these pillars help ensure an uninterrupted education, one that allows the child to study, grow and find themselves, knowing that their families are not sliding into greater poverty without them.

The CCF model has provided remarkable results on nearly every level. The school registration rate is near 100 percent; the daily absentee rate lower than most developed countries; no mother has died through childbirth in over three years; the older youth are now running the community programmes and the younger youth have real and relatable mentors.

We don’t believe that “scaling up” is the answer. Implementing any of our programs in isolation leads to dependency and removes self-governance. We also don’t believe in scattering these programmes; simply feeding the hungry or building schools, without providing the required social and community structure, leaves a trail of unsustainable entities. We do believe that replication, community by community, is the only long-term answer.

I urge you to take a closer look at CCF: our practices, values, financial records, the “reviews” of those who have spent time here and of course the success of our programmes.

Our needs are still significant and we continue to receive the most impoverished and abused children. We still bring in the most in-need and at-risk children the same way: one by one. We teach, we care, we lead, love and we turn the light back on in their eyes.

Scott Neeson, Founder and Executive Director
Cambodian Children’s Fund is supported through generous donations from individuals, corporations and foundations. In 2012, Charity Navigator, an independent charity evaluator, again awarded CCF with four stars out of a possible four for fiscal excellence. Relative to the overall financial performance, CCF scored an admirable 66.12 out of a possible 70 points.

CCF is independently audited every year to meet US accounting standards, ensuring all measures of performance are accurate and quantifiable.

Our Mission

Cambodian Children’s Fund (CCF) is a charitable organization founded in 2004 to lift the community of the Steung Meanchey landfill district out of poverty and into a new era of hope and possibility through the provision of education.

At the core of our approach is a fundamental belief that education will provide children with pathways out of poverty, and that by developing the leadership potential of our students, leaders will emerge that will create generational change and a better future for Cambodia.

Through a comprehensive approach to community development that reaches beyond the child to help families get back on their feet, CCF is lifting whole communities out of poverty and creating generational change amongst the most marginalized of populations.

CCF started with a class of around 40 students in 2004. Today, there are more than 1,500 students across a range of educational and vocational training facilities.

Cambodian Children’s Fund transforms the country’s most impoverished kids into tomorrow’s leaders.

Our Operations

The Cambodian Children’s Fund is new-model for community development that we think is unparalleled anywhere in the world.

The idea behind CCF is simple - to use education as a pathway out of poverty for Cambodian children and their families. However we realised early on that education programs alone are not enough - to be successful we need to help a fractured community heal, and to remove the barriers to education that keep children out of the classroom.
Today, Cambodian Children’s Fund operates 64 programs as part of our comprehensive approach to community development, and while many of these programs are not education-focused, they all play an essential part in our success in providing education to many children who were once thought unreachable.

Our Childcare program means older children don’t need to stay home looking after siblings when their parents are out working or scavenging. Our Bread Program not only provides nutritionally enhanced bread to community kids before class, it also rewards the family by sending home loaves at the end of the week, and it provides vocational training for young adults in our bakery vocational training program. Our free medical clinic means children aren’t sent to work to pay off healthcare related debts (a common occurrence).

It’s through this whole community approach that CCF has been able achieve incredible results - like a daily absentee rate of less than 2 percent and an annual student retention of 97 percent. But what is truly amazing is that we are now seeing CCF students graduate from high-school and begin their university studies.

For us, there is nothing more powerful than seeing children who once scavenged through garbage on the Phnom Penh landfill heading off to university as confident young adults.

Education on its own is a limited success - we want more than a good job for our students, we want them to be leaders that work to create a better future for all Cambodians.

Through CCF’s Leadership Program, these students remain intricately involved in our organisation - whether it be in teaching evening classes at our satellite schools, running leadership camps for younger students, organising our evening food program or visiting isolated elderly people in the Steung Mean Chey community. These young adults are not only the future of CCF - they are the future leaders of families, of communities and of their country.

With the number of CCF students enrolled in University expected to pass 150 in the next two years, we are now seeing the long term impact our programs are having.

It’s CCF’s unique blend of education, leadership and community outreach that is creating a better future for thousands of young Cambodians.

The following donor list is a small thank you to the donors who gave to CCF through our US office in 2012.

From large corporate donors who are attracted to CCF’s comprehensive model for community development, to families who selflessly put money aside each month to sponsor a child, through to a child raising $20 at a bake sale - we are forever grateful to everyone who supports CCF.
